Subject: Latest Houthi Escalation in Yemen

Dear Colin,

On behalf of the Embassy of Saudi Arabia, I wanted to share with you the latest developments from Yemen. Unfortunately, the Houthis continue to engage in deeply destabilizing activities that make it much more difficult to achieve a political solution to the conflict.

This week, the Houthis have pressed their military offensive to the city of Marib, which is controlled by the legitimate government of Yemen and where hundreds of thousands of internally displaced refugees are located.

As Reuters has reported, the United Nations has condemned Houthis for these hostilities and exacerbating the humanitarian crisis in Yemen. "An assault on the city would put two million civilians at risk, with hundreds of thousands potentially forced to flee - with unimaginable humanitarian consequences," UN aid chief Mark Lowcock said on Tuesday, urging de-escalation.

The Reuters article also quotes State Department spokesman Ned Price as condemning the Houthis for undermining the prospects for achieving a peaceful resolution to the conflict: "The Houthis' assault on Marib is the action of a group not committed to peace or to ending the war afflicting the people of Yemen."

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia seeks a political resolution to the conflict in Yemen in accordance with applicable UN Security Council Resolutions. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is committed to working with UN Special Envoy Martin Griffiths and newly appointed US Special Envoy Tim Lenderking in order to achieve a negotiated settlement to the conflict.

Public statements from your Member of Congress in calling out the Houthis for their intransigence will send a strong message to the Houthis that will hopefully contribute to advancing the political process.

Thank you for your consideration.

All my best,

Norm

Subject: Latest Houthi Escalation in Yemen

Dear Lauren,

On behalf of the Embassy of Saudi Arabia, I wanted to share with you the latest developments from Yemen. Unfortunately, the Houthis continue to engage in deeply destabilizing activities that make it much more difficult to achieve a political solution to the conflict.

This week, the Houthis have pressed their military offensive to the city of Marib, which is controlled by the legitimate government of Yemen and where hundreds of thousands of internally displaced refugees are located.

As Reuters has reported, the United Nations has condemned Houthis for these hostilities and exacerbating the humanitarian crisis in Yemen. "An assault on the city would put two million civilians at risk, with hundreds of thousands potentially forced to flee - with unimaginable humanitarian consequences," UN aid chief Mark Lowcock said on Tuesday, urging de-escalation.

The Reuters article also quotes State Department spokesman Ned Price as condemning the Houthis for undermining the prospects for achieving a peaceful resolution to the conflict: "The Houthis' assault on Marib is the action of a group not committed to peace or to ending the war afflicting the people of Yemen."

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia seeks a political resolution to the conflict in Yemen in accordance with applicable UN Security Council Resolutions. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is committed to working with UN Special Envoy Martin Griffiths and newly appointed US Special Envoy Tim Lenderking in order to achieve a negotiated settlement to the conflict.

Public statements from your Member of Congress in calling out the Houthis for their intransigence will send a strong message to the Houthis that will hopefully contribute to advancing the political process.

On behalf of the Embassy of Saudi Arabia, I wanted to share with you the latest developments from Yemen. Unfortunately, the Houthis continue to engage in deeply destabilizing activities that make it much more difficult to achieve a political solution to the conflict.

This week, the Houthis have pressed their military offensive to the city of Marib, which is controlled by the legitimate government of Yemen and where hundreds of thousands of internally displaced refugees are located.

As Reuters has reported, the United Nations has condemned Houthis for these hostilities and exacerbating the humanitarian crisis in Yemen. "An assault on the city would put two million civilians at risk, with hundreds of thousands potentially forced to flee - with unimaginable humanitarian consequences," UN aid chief Mark Lowcock said on Tuesday, urging de-escalation.

The Reuters article also quotes State Department spokesman Ned Price as condemning the Houthis for undermining the prospects for achieving a peaceful resolution to the conflict: "The Houthis' assault on Marib is the action of a group not committed to peace or to ending the war afflicting the people of Yemen."

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia seeks a political resolution to the conflict in Yemen in accordance with applicable UN Security Council Resolutions. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is committed to working with UN Special Envoy Martin Griffiths and newly appointed US Special Envoy Tim Lenderking in order to achieve a negotiated settlement to the conflict.

Public statements from your Member of Congress in calling out the Houthis for their intransigence will send a strong message to the Houthis that will hopefully contribute to advancing the political process.

Thank you for your consideration.

Subject: Latest Houthi Escalation in Yemen

Dear Louise,

On behalf of the Embassy of Saudi Arabia, I wanted to share with you the latest developments from Yemen. Unfortunately, the Houthis continue to engage in deeply destabilizing activities that make it much more difficult to achieve a political solution to the conflict.

This week, the Houthis have pressed their military offensive to the city of Marib, which is controlled by the legitimate government of Yemen and where hundreds of thousands of internally displaced refugees are located.

As Reuters has reported, the United Nations has condemned Houthis for these hostilities and exacerbating the humanitarian crisis in Yemen. "An assault on the city would put two million civilians at risk, with hundreds of thousands potentially forced to flee - with unimaginable humanitarian consequences," U.N aid chief Mark Lowcock said on Tuesday, urging de-escalation.

The Reuters article also quotes State Department spokesman Ned Price as condemning the Houthis for undermining the prospects for achieving a peaceful resolution to the conflict: "The Houthis' assault on Marib is the action of a group not committed to peace or to ending the war afflicting the people of Yemen."

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia seeks a political resolution to the conflict in Yemen in accordance with applicable UN Security Council Resolutions. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is committed to working with UN Special Envoy Martin Griffiths and newly appointed US Special Envoy Tim Lenderking in order to achieve a negotiated settlement to the conflict.

Public statements from your Member of Congress in calling out the Houthis for their intransigence will send a strong message to the Houthis that will hopefully contribute to advancing the political process.

Thank you for your consideration.
